TIME TRAVEL

WHAT'S UP?

That's a hard question, because even the smartest scientists and philosophers can't say for sure what time really is. The only way that we even know time exists is by the way things change.

Imagine you live in a world without time. Everything is at a standstill — nothing moves, nothing changes. You sit perfectly quiet, and nothing happens. Then, all of a sudden, something does change — a leaf falls, or a clock ticks, or you blink your eyes. Now there's a difference between the way things were before the change happened and the way things are now. Time is the period between "before" and "now."

Of course, in the real world changes happen all the time. The passing of time depends on things changing. Some changes happen only once — you lose your first tooth. Some changes happen over and over again — the sun rises every morning and sets every night. Thousands and thousands of years ago, people used repeating changes like the sunrise as a way to begin measuring time.

Today time is measured in several ways. Some measurements of time, such as days, months, and years, are based on repeating changes like sunrise, the phases of the moon, and the circling of the earth around the sun. Other ways of measuring time, such as the seven-day week or the sixty-minute hour, are artificial measurements invented by people and not based on repeating changes in the natural world.

Okay, now here comes a really hard part: Scientists think of time as a thing that can be measured, just like length or weight. BUT they also know that their measurements of time can be affected by the way objects move. It takes more advanced science than we can get into here to even talk about these things, but when you're ready you can learn about them for yourself. In the meantime, all you need to know is that some scientists think that maybe time doesn't just flow forward, nonstop, from "before" to "now."

Often when people talk about time travel, they mean traveling into the future. For that to happen, there would have to be a place — the future — for them to go to, that is, the future

~~would have to exist~~ already. Some philosophers think it does; some think it doesn't. What do you think? (Your guess is as good as theirs.)

In the story "Working Over Time" in this issue of The Flintstones and The Jetsons, Mr. Spacely wanted to travel backward into the past. For him to reach the past, it would have to continue to exist even after it was "over." What do you think about that?

The idea of time travel has always been popular in science fiction stories. But is there any scientific proof that time travel could really happen? Well, there are a lot of scientific theories about a lot of different kinds of things — relativity and metaphysics and the fourth dimension — that might help to show that there really could be time travel, but so far the theories have not been proved. Until someone shows that real time travel is possible, your memories are the best way to visit the past, and your imagination is the best way to visit the future!
